

Ombudsman Saskatchewan announces new Accessibility and Inclusion Unit during Disability Pride Month

In recognition of Disability Pride Month, Ombudsman Saskatchewan is proud to announce the creation of its new Accessibility and Inclusion Unit, marking another step in its commitment to delivering fair, accessible, inclusive and people-centred services for everyone in Saskatchewan.

The new unit supports the Office's commitment to advancing accessibility in alignment with The Accessible Saskatchewan Act. Bringing together a team of professionals with expertise in accessibility, inclusion, Indigenous education and community engagement, the team will provide education and training, promote inclusive practices, help people better understand their rights, and contribute to reducing barriers and improving equitable access across the province.

By investing in accessibility, education and collaboration, the Office of the Ombudsman continues to strengthen its commitment to fairness and quality public services, ensuring its services are welcoming, responsive and accessible to the diverse communities it serves.

Ombudsman Saskatchewan announces new Accessibility and Inclusion Unit during Disability Pride Month

“Disability Pride Month reminds us that accessibility is not simply about removing physical barriers—it is about creating systems where every person feels respected, heard and able to participate fully. Fairness is about ensuring that every process, every relationship and every outcome reflect and demonstrate inclusion, respect and equity.”
